The Barker's Biggest Moment

THE reporter sat on a camp stool, pencil poised above his notebook.

"What I'd really like, Mr. Calahan," he said, "is an account of your most exciting experience in the circus."

Carnie Calahan, the Barker for Colonel Lane's Mammoth Circus, smiled reminiscently. He knocked the ash from his cigar.

"Well," he said, "a barker has a lot of experiences, some of 'em exciting, I suppose—at least, to others; to me, they have just been part of the regular grind."

"I know," said the reporter, "but that's what I want—a story for those others. After all, Mr. Calahan, the 'others' constitute your audience. They're entitled to a reading thrill occasionally."

Carnie nodded. "So I presume. Well, if you must have it, I guess my most exciting time happened when I was a youngster traveling with a Mississippi River showboat company."

"We had left Cincinnati," he went on, "during a rainstorm. The crowds had been gratifying during our three-day stay there, and Col. Lane was pretty happy about it. Our next stop was St. Louis."

"None of the people with the show now were with us then. The boat was none too large for the outfit we carried in those days. There was a snake charmer, a Miss Bosco, who owned the biggest python anyone has ever seen. That snake was forty-two feet long. He had a special box for transportation. We kept him sluggish during shows, and about every five weeks gave the cash customers a treat by feeding him crate after crate of live chickens."

"A storm came up when we were in mid-river. I never saw it blow so hard. The skipper had a time of it keeping the boat from crashing into the shore, but we managed to stay clear."

"The engineer was crowding the boilers keeping up steam enough to give us power against that wild wind. But suddenly one of the boiler heads let loose. Live steam shot out and scalded several stokers. They ran screaming for the companions and came racing up. A fire box next let loose and masses of burning cinders filled the boiler room. In a moment, there was a great fire roaring in the holds."

"Well, the first thing you do when fire happens aboard a boat with animals, is to free the animals. That's what we did. Imagine, if you can, seeing a half dozen huge elephants going over the side and splashing into the river. They swam for shore. Then two giraffes, and a lot of other harmless beasts.

"We didn't know what to do with the wild animals. The colonel said we'd better let 'em go down, since they'd give the river towns a pretty bad time. But some of the keepers went berserk and turned every cat loose—lions, tigers, leopards, a hippo, rhino, several warthogs with tusks nine inches long."

"The python's box was on deck. I yelled to roll it over the side intact and let the snake drown, but that didn't happen. That snake was excited and he burst out of his box. He went over the side in a jiffy and began swimming for shore."

"By this time, the boilers were exploding and everybody was taking to the lifeboats. We pulled for shore amid screaming, roaring beasts on both sides, behind and in front of us. It just happened that most of the animals made for the same shore, and it was fortunate that no town was there."

"That was a good many years ago when the old river wasn't so built up. Trees grew thick along both banks. We knew that the animals would make for the woods and probably cause no trouble if we could get men to round them up, or shoot them."

"Some of the stokers were badly burned but we managed to get them to the hospital in a town five miles down-river. We holed up in the same place at the Planters Hotel. I reported the episode to the local police. The chief didn't seem to think it was any of his business. He merely said that he'd order his men to shoot any animals that entered the town."

"That's where he made a mistake. That night one of the tigers loped down the main street, howling like a banshee. You can imagine what consternation it caused. The street cleared as if a plague had hit. People slammed doors, banged down windows, kept the lights off. That old Bengal tiger roamed all through the town during the night, roaring and coughing. Once he climbed up the side of a house and tore a mess of shingles off its roof. They tell me the people inside nearly died of fright. In the morning the police sneaked out armed with rifles and shotguns. But the tiger had gone."

"I sent a telegram to St. Louis asking for militia, which was promised. But in those days no one seemed to be in a particular hurry. The militia didn't arrive for two days. It's about those two days that this story really has to do.

"Some of the boys went to a pub next morning. After about two hours, a waiter began yelling like he was caught in a bear trap. Then into the half-dark room came that giant python! Can you see the picture? Remember, it's a pub. The boys are pretty hilarious. But when that huge serpent came rolling in, I can tell you pandemonium broke loose. They almost tore out the front wall getting to the street. None of them stopped until they had reached the wood that came down close to the town's edge. And there they were stopped by a sight that was almost as frightening as the python. Five big elephants came slouching out of the woods, and beside them grunted our old rhino, his big nose tusk raised.

"Man alive! I have never seen anything so funny. Of course those animals were tame—the elephants anyway, and there wouldn't have been much trouble if the men had stood their ground. They didn't. They yelled and turned and tore back toward town.

"Now it's a known fact that wild animals that are almost raised in cages have little fear of men, nor do they particularly wish to molest them. But just start running from a free animal and he's almost certain to trot after you. That score of men went whooping back toward town and behind them came the five elephants and the rhino. The elephants crashed through a half dozen small buildings as if they were matchwood, emptying chicken houses and letting cattle loose.

"This might not have been so bad if the lions hadn't decided to put in an appearance. One of those lions was a mean old devil we never used in an act. He hated elephants. He came racing out of the woods, made for the tail elephant and jumped onto his back. When a lion hits like that, you can bet his claws are out. He ripped into that old pachyderm with a blood-chilling roar. The elephant reared, trumpeting, trying to unseat the lion. The lion clung, trying to bite through the elephant's neck.

"This bloody battle was taking place right in the town's square. The elephant knocked over the statue to Robert E. Lee, plunged into the fountain pool, then barged head-first into the city hall. The front of the building caved in. The police were at their wits' end. They were popping at the lions, the elephants, and themselves. I think two of them were badly shot that day. Their bullets didn't stop any of the animals.

"Our boys were shouting and yelling and trying to get some order into those trained animals' heads. But everything was too excited and noisy. But at last we got all the animals headed into the river. That is, the five elephants and the rhino. The lion was still riding his elephant. And he stuck even when the big brute plunged into the water. They all swam out to an island a half mile off shore. The militia helped us trap them next day."

"What about the other animals—the lions and tigers?" asked the reporter.

"For several years," replied The Barker, "those cats roamed the woods thereabouts, and once in a while some hunter would bring one down. Those woods for miles around were taboo for a long time to anyone who wasn't an experienced hunter. But eventually they were all shot, as was the python."

The reporter grinned as he wrote swiftly.

"That's a honey of a yarn," he said. "My city editor will give me a bonus—maybe even a raise. But tell me, Mr. Calahan, what was your biggest thrill during that exciting time?"

The Barker thought a moment, then laughed.

"It was when I found a little garter snake in my hotel room the next day. Little chap wasn't more'n a foot long, but I leaped and yelled like a wild man. You see, I don't like snakes, no matter how small they are."

I'M SAM SNIDER, THE DIAMOND BROKER! ALL I REMEMBER IS THAT THE OFFICE SAFE WAS LIFTED UP AND CRASHED THROUGH THE WALL! AFTER THAT, THE WHOLE BUILDING SEEMED TO COME APART!

I CAN SEE MYSELF TURNING IN MY BADGE OVER THIS BUSINESS!

CHEER UP, CAPTAIN! I OVERHEARD MR. SNIDER--- AND I THINK HE'S GIVEN US A CLUE!

QUICK-SILVER! EVEN YOU WON'T BE ABLE TO HELP US THIS TIME!

WHAT CLUE? I KNOW ONLY WHAT I'VE ALREADY TOLD YOU!

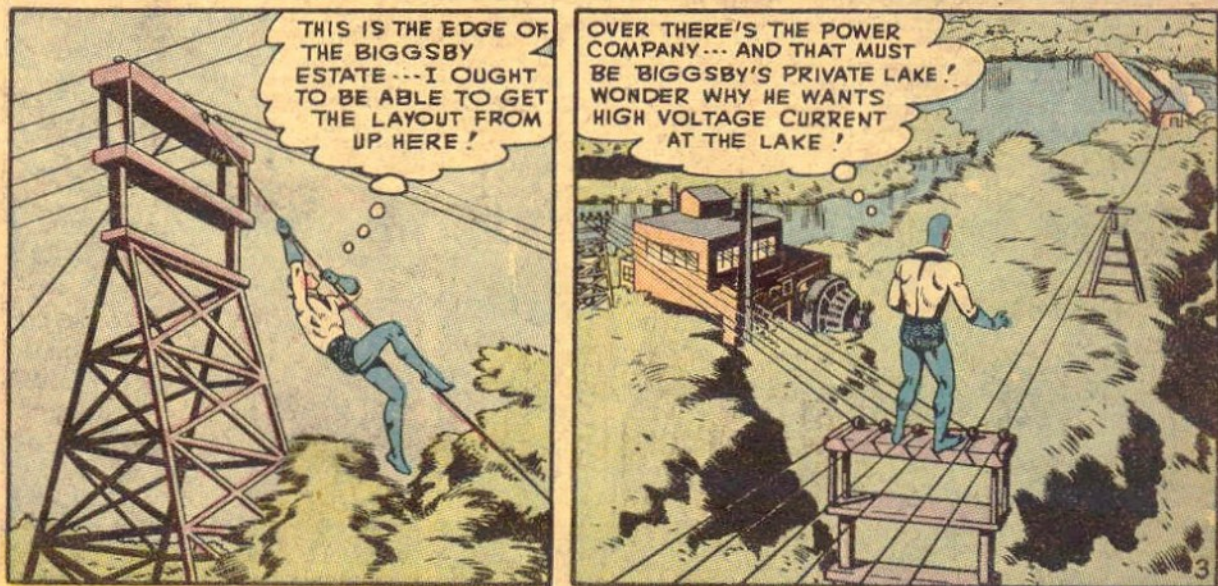

THAT'S JUST IT--- YOU SAID YOUR OFFICE SAFE WAS LIFTED UP AND PULLED THROUGH THE WALL BY AN UNSEEN FORCE! WHICH WAY DID IT GO?

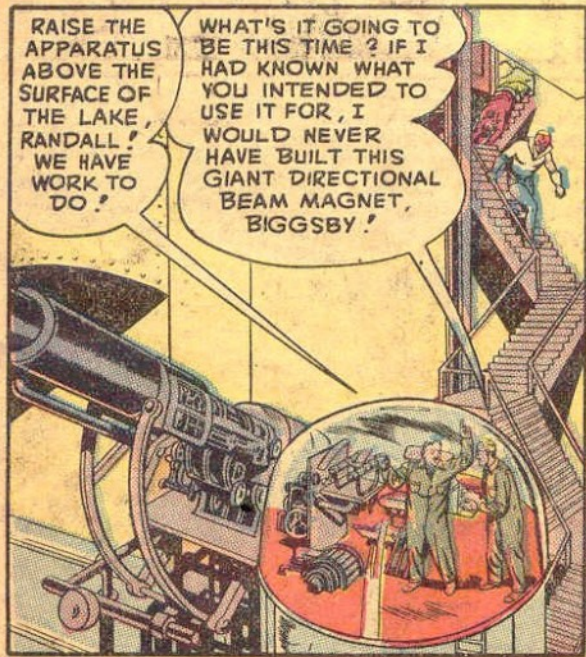

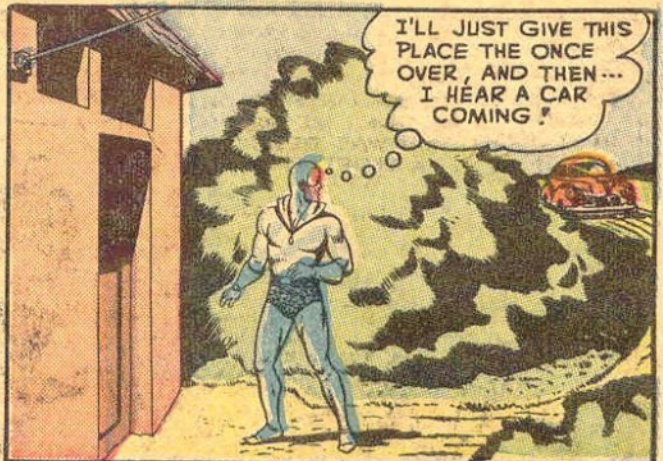

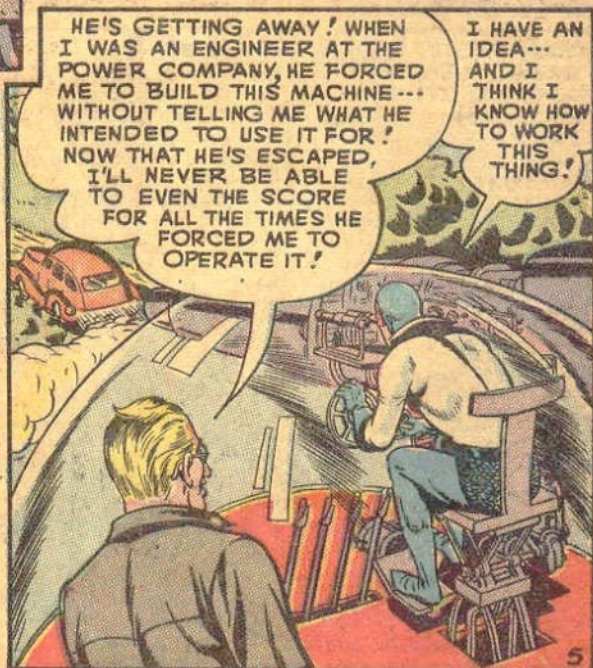

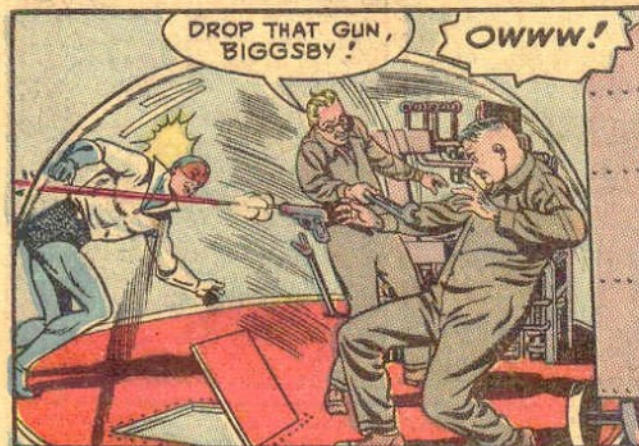

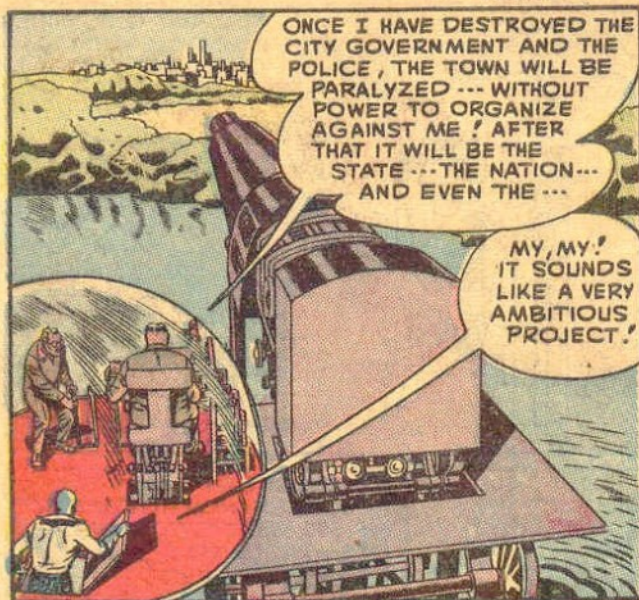

IT CRASHED THROUGH THE WALL IN THAT DIRECTION!

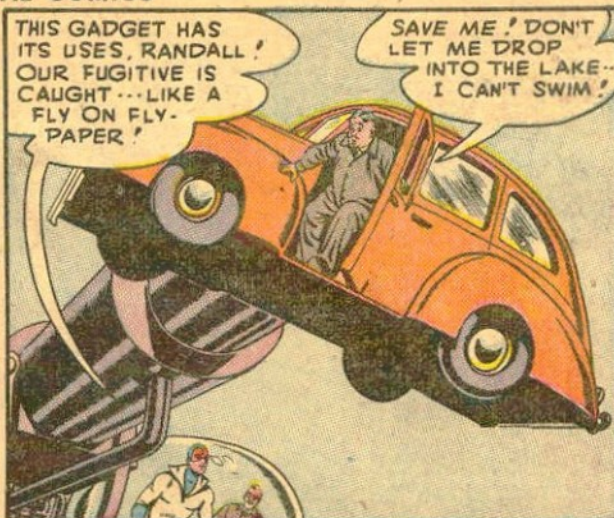

THAT'S WEST! THERE'S YOUR CLUE, CAPTAIN! LET'S GO BACK TO HEADQUARTERS AND LOOK AT A MAP OF THE CITY! MAYBE WE'LL FIND SOMETHING!
